

PERSONALITY TYPES

“Those who cannot do what they want must want what they can. Because to want what he cannot do would be foolish.”

Leonardo da Vinci

The Da Vinci theorem is the basis for our personality profile. A visionary who whines is not creative in this phase. Conversely, an analyst to whom numbers are more important than words may be capable of dazzling lyricism in a phase of being in love. A doer, extroverted and spoiled for success, can be so weakened after a defeat that he wants only silence for a long time. A sociable person, for whom relationships are the core of his existence, may well be capable of performance cascades when he senses the career opportunity of a lifetime. For us, emotions are the true drivers in our professional and everyday lives. They can be so strong that new branches emerge in the personality crown. That is why we say: People have a basic structure, yes, that is true. But they can transcend this structure, they can expand it, they can turn it up until the thoughts fly.

If your character is 50 percent inborn, then that 50 percent is probably God-given. Rejoice in that because that is a gift! The other 50 percent has grown through your work, your experiences, your experiences. From both facets, the inborn and the acquired, we defined four personality types by decoding a cipher:

We asked ourselves: how do people enjoy their food? How do they order their pizza, their pasta? And what does the way they enjoy say about their character, their timing, their intention beyond satisfying hunger?

You will find the answers below.

The Vapiano type: The Vapiano type analyzes, plans and wants to avoid mistakes. He is an exemplary time manager. He consistently excludes disturbances because he focuses on his topics. Surprises are annoying to him - predictability is his goal. In general, he likes security in his job and in life, preferably everything contractually guaranteed, because that gives him an inner peace. A Vapiano type is reliable, intelligent, ambitious. He does not throw money or emotions around. These characteristics are also reflected in his choice of restaurant: for him, neither ambience nor conviviality count. He wants to see the ingredients before they land on his table cooked and simmered, and above all he wants to be able to rely on price and service. A Vapiano type satisfies his hunger in a matter-of-fact way: he counts the calories and nutrients, and everything can be organic. He forgoes an appetizer, and even the espresso at the end is just too much. Anyone who goes out to eat with a Vapiano type will not experience any discussion about the bill: Everyone pays for themselves. It's that simple.

Vapiano types are often technicians, controllers, auditors or accountants in companies. In the team, they are the ones who anticipate and avoid mistakes. Their high level of expertise will impress some. However, Vapiano types tend to overwhelm their colleagues with details. Then they talk shop, assuming others understand their technically correct language. Quality of work is a concern for them. To achieve this, they are prepared to invest a lot in further training. By the way, there are hardly any conflicts with them, because they are loners and avoid gossip. Facts are what they want. They grow by the tasks and not by popularity. There is a great deal of long-suffering and consistency in the roots of a Vapiano type.

The Pizzeria type: The Pizzeria type is dynamic, entertaining and always in a hurry. And yet he is the center of attention in every round. He loves that, because the attention of others is like an elixir for him. That is why he likes to talk, mainly about himself and the projects he's currently juggling. He usually holds five in the air with impressive agility, and he expects applause for that.

A pizzeria type wants variety, so he chooses the menu of the day on the menu. If you go out to eat with a pizzeria type, you'll have an entertaining break. He doesn't have to worry about a silence spreading between the main course and dessert. Rather, he might fear not getting a chance to speak himself, because a pizzeria type always has something to say. Actually, the lunch break is not enough for his repertoire of topics. After an espresso, he is highly satisfied, likes to take over the bill for everyone with a grand gesture and puts a big tip on top.

In a company, the pizzeria type is often a manager, a team leader who sets the pace. He strives for results instead of goals. In return, he is willing to work under pressure. He doesn't like routine, and he can't stand defeat. He wants to win, and he wants to win quickly so that he can bask in success. His emotional factor runs high - pride, joy, happiness are his favorites. His skills lie in inspiring others, encouraging them, and beyond that, keeping success in sight. His driver is the question: Where please is the way to the top? In doing so, he charges ahead, hoping that others can follow.

The Casa type: He loves life, company and food, preferably at home, because there it is cozy, there you can indulge in homemade delicacies. He chooses the ingredients carefully, they should be healthy and digestible. He prepares a menu with dedication. When the guests arrive, subtle music plays in the background, candlelight softens the atmosphere. Dishes and flowers, good smells combine to create a harmony. One should feel comfortable in his rooms. And if a guest brings wine or a salad, the Casa type is happy about it and will be lavish with praise. A Casa type appreciates his guests and offers them a stage; if they are happy, he is happy.

Casa types can be found at all levels of a company - from management to reception. They have the gift of smelling out conflicts in advance and intercepting them; nothing should disturb the warm climate. In return, they are always ready to talk and do favors, even leaving their own tasks undone. In their roots they carry a talent for relationship skills. They themselves flourish when they support others. Appreciation is their trademark word and thus they are emotional by nature. Their motto might be: If you need me, I am there for you.

RISTORANTE

The Ristorante type: The Ristorante type is an explorer, an appreciator, a person with dazzling ideas. He prefers creative cuisine with its refined compositions - that triggers his taste. Just no one-size-fits-all and definitely no home cooking! He chooses his wines and the menu from the upper category, not the price is decisive, but the good feeling. For a ristorante type, food is synonymous with cosmopolitanism. He can usually name the differences in international cuisines with passion, and he may give the chef a greeting and a tip on how to refine the chocolate mousse. He is willing to dig deep into his wallet for his high standards, and he pays his guests' bill at the same time. In a company, a ristorante type is the visionary. He sees developments ahead, recognizes connections where others are still groping in the dark. He knows how to inspire colleagues with his topics and often sets his own markers in a project. Anyone who thinks a ristorante type is a dreamer is mistaken. His creativity rests on solid knowledge, and his ambition is always to be the best. His emotional factor is generally high. He always knows how to push himself with good humor and a remarkable self-confidence. The strength of a ristorante type is his mental and physical agility. He always thinks out of the box. And: where others stumble, he knocks the dust off his pants and asks himself: "What is my plan B in life?".
